Background and purpose

As one of its services to American schools and colleges, the United States Office of Education provides these institutions with information about the educational materials of the Federal Government; and as part of this service, the Office collects, catalogs, and publishes information about the motion pictures and filmstrips of all Government agencies--continuously through the issuance of Library of Congress film catalog cards and occasionally through book catalogs.

In February 1950 the Bureau of the Budget, by direction of the President, issued a circular to the heads of all executive departments and establishments of the Federal Government calling their attention to this service of the Office of Education and requesting that certain basic information about their films be furnished to the Office of Education. In its circular, the Bureau of the Budget stressed the following values of a catalog of U.S. Government films:

"It is anticipated (a) that the information so compiled and the catalog, with supplements and revisions as needed, will be helpful not only to educational institutions, other community organizations, and the general public but also to all departments and establishments of the Government; (b) that it will facilitate and expedite the answering of inquiries addressed to the Government concerning the existence and availability of Government films; and (c) that it will provide all departments and establishments with a central information source on the existence of Government films."

In 1951, the Office of Education and the Library of Congress entered into a cooperative agreement whereby the Office, having information about all Government films (in accordance with the Bureau of the Budget directive), would furnish such information to the Library and the Library would print and distribute 3 x 5 catalog cards for all these films. This cooperative cataloging service is now firmly established, and Library of Congress cards are available for all of the films described in this 1960 catalog.

Scope of the catalog

In the preparation of this catalog, four basic criteria have been used in defining its scope. In the first place, "U.S. Government" has been interpreted to include all agencies of the executive, judicial, and legislative branches of the Federal Government (including wholly owned Government corporations). But not included in the catalog are films of quasi-official agencies such as the American Red Cross; of international agencies such as the Pan American Union and the United Nations; or of State and local governments.

Second, the word "films," as used in the catalog, includes both motion pictures and filmstrips.

A third criterion, more difficult of interpretation than the previous two standards, relates to the extent of ownership and sponsorship of a film by an agency of the Federal Government. In this catalog, "U.S. Government films" have been defined as those films which are (a) the property of the Federal Government, including negative and reproduction rights; or which, if not owned by the Government, are (b) presented officially by the Government and to which the Government has major distribution rights. Not included in the catalog are films, produced by non-Government sources, copies of which may have been acquired by and are being distributed by a particular Government agency, but to which the Government's equity and sponsorship extend only to these copies.

Availability for public use

This catalog includes all U.S. Government films--as defined by the three above-mentioned criteria--which are available for public use in the United States. This fourth criterion is also difficult of interpretation, but here it has been defined as follows: If prints (copies) of a film can be purchased and used by the public in the United States, that film has been considered available. If prints of a film cannot be purchased, however, a film has been considered available only if there are sufficient prints in circulation to take care of public requests for the film. Admittedly, the number of "sufficient prints" is variable, depending upon the nature of the subject matter and the probable size of the audience for a particular film. Only those films which are actually available and reasonably accessible for public use in the United States have been included in the catalog.

These, then, are the four criteria used in the selection of the U.S. Government films included in this catalog. Only those films which met these criteria have been included. Not included in the catalog are films which have been withdrawn because of obsolescence or other reasons; films which are used solely as working tools by a Government agency; films which consist of unedited footage or "stock shots"; and films whose public use in the United States is prohibited for security reasons, legal restrictions, or policy considerations.

Preparation of the catalog

As explained above, the Office of Education and the Library of Congress have cooperatively cataloged all of the films listed and described in this catalog. LC's film catalog cards, available for all of the films, provided the basic material used in preparing the catalog--essential descriptive information about individual films and film series and the subject headings under which the films have been classified. To these descriptive and subject-matter data have been added certain items concerning the availability of each film--borrow, rent, and purchase instructions and information concerning its availability for television exhibition.

This is, of course, an overly simplified explanation of the preparation of the catalog. Many additional steps were taken in the compilation of the information, in the checking of the accuracy and authenticity of such information, and in the cataloging process itself. Such steps need not be described--they can be inferred--except to say that the Office of Education has attempted to provide in this catalog an accurate and complete listing--as of July 1, 1960--of all U.S. Government motion pictures and filmstrips then available for public educational use within the United States.

U. S. GOVERNMENT FILMS AND FILM SERVICES

Motion pictures and filmstrips of the United States Government are made to be used in the administration and execution of specific programs authorized by Congress, such as the prevention of forest fires, the training of military personnel, or the control of communicable diseases. This is a basic concept--that films support programs--which underlies an understanding of the production, distribution, and use of Government films. It is most significant that there are today no specific appropriations of funds to any Government agency specifically for the production and use of films; yet nearly every agency is using films in its program activities.

Basically, the Government uses films in four different ways: (1) in recording data of aeronautical experiments, plant growth, gunnery tests, and the like; (2) in the education and training of Government personnel, military and civilian; (3) for the information and education of public groups in the United States; and (4) in information and education programs outside the United States.

In addition to these uses of films, the Government provides a number of film services--card cataloging of films, Government and non-Government, by the Library of Congress; copywriting of films, also through the Library of Congress; film research studies such as those conducted at Pennsylvania State University with Army and Navy funds; preparation of film bibliographies on child development, mental health, or atomic energy; assistance in the export of films through studies of foreign markets, fostering international agreements, and the issuance of special catalogs; providing film producers with stock footage on atomic energy or agriculture or other subjects.

From film to audience

Films of the United States Government, being made to be used in the administration and execution of specific programs, are designed for definitive audiences. These purposes and audiences determine the particular methods of their distribution.

There are three ways in which Government films can reach audiences in the United States: (1) theatrical exhibition in movie theatres; (2) television to home audiences; and (3) nontheatrical use in schools, clubs, industry, unions, etc.

These three methods of film distribution, of course, are used not only by Government agencies but by all film producers and distributors. Their relative value depends upon the nature of a film, the composition of the film's audience, and the intended effect of the film upon its audience.

In general, theatrical and/or television exhibition of U.S. Government films is deliberately used only for those films aimed at large non-selective audience, e.g., the Smokey Bear shorts on forest fire prevention, recruiting messages of the Armed Forces, or an explanation of the most recent changes in social security benefits.

Most Government films, as evidenced from the film descriptions in this catalog, are too specialized for the heterogeneous audiences in movie theaters or before television screens in homes. What is the audience for a film explanation of diseases in hogs? Or the intramedullary fixation of the femur? Or rough-facing, boring, and turning a shoulder on the vertical boring mill? Such films, quite obviously, are for specialized nontheatrical audiences.

Television

Despite the fact that most Government films are too specialized for television audiences, all agencies today recognize the importance of this method of distributing their films and reaching audiences through "long-range" projection. Looking not only at today's needs but also to future possibilities and developments, most agencies producing films today are automatically clearing them for television use. Of the motion pictures listed in this catalog, approximately a third may be used on television. All such films are identified by the notation "Cleared for tv."

The conditions under which such films may be televised and the restrictions upon such use vary with different agencies, but in general the following provisions apply to the television exhibition of Government films:

1. The films must be televised in their entirety, including credit titles. Some agencies permit minor deletions to be made, if necessary because of program time limitations, if such deletions do not alter the basic content and integrity of the film.

2. The films must be televised continuously from beginning to end except for routine "breaks" for station identification. They shall not be broken for advertisements.

3. The films may be used only on sustaining programs. Some agencies permit their films to be used on sponsored programs but specify that such use shall not constitute endorsement by the Government of the program, sponsor, product, or station.

Any institution or group wishing to use a Government film on television should write to the particular agency owning the film for its specific conditions governing such use.

Nontheatrical film distribution

There are today almost as many ways of distributing Government films nontheatrically as there are Government agencies with such films. The Department of Agriculture, for example, distributes on a free loan basis its forestry films from the regional offices of the Forest Service; its soil conservation films from State offices of the Soil Conservation Service; two films on crop insurance through State offices of the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation; film on farm credit and cooperatives through the Farm Credit Administration; and some films from the USDA Motion Picture Service in Washington. The Department also distributes its films upon a service-charge or rental basis through 70 depository film libraries located mainly in State agricultural extension offices and in land-grant colleges and universities. Then, too, USDA films are distributed upon a sales basis--motion pictures through United World Films, Inc., New York; filmstrips through Photo Lab Inc., Washington. And, of course, films which are purchased are, in turn, distributed on various loan and rental bases by school, university, public, commercial, and other film libraries.

Here, in a single agency, is the use of practically all methods of nontheatrical film distribution. The one exception is that of "sponsored film" distribution, i.e., the use of a commercial company to distribute films with the cost of such distribution being paid by the sponsor. This method, commonly used by industry, has seldom been employed by the Government.

Generally speaking, Government agencies use several different methods in distributing, nontheatrically, their films throughout the United States--as described above for the Department of Agriculture. In so doing, the Government is following the same pattern as most educational and industrial film producers who use, in variation and combination, different loan, rental, and sales outlets.

Loan by Government offices

Little explanation needs to be made of this method of distributing Government films. It resembles the "free copy" distribution of Government publications with the particular agency lending, upon request, its films for use by a school, community group, technical society, etc. The borrower agrees to use the film in its entirety, to charge no admission, to return the film promptly, to pay transportation costs, and to pay for any damage to the film. Some agencies restrict the use of their films to particular audiences--medical films to professional groups, for example--and in general all agencies give priority to applicents representing the segment of the U.S. public for whom the film was made.

The Armed Forces, in lending films to the public, make a distinction between public information films and internal training films. The former may be borrowed from the appropriate Army, Navy, and Air Force installations. The latter, having been made for the training of Armed Forces personnel, are used primarily for such purpose and are not generally loaned to the public. Instead, they have been made available for sale. In certain instances, if a film is not being used for military training, the Armed Forces installation will lend it to educational institutions.

Loan through depository libraries

Instead of lending films directly to the public, some Government agencies use a system of "depository libraries" whereby they furnish to established 16mm film libraries throughout the country prints of their films on a long-term loan, and these film libraries distribute the prints so deposited to their regular clientele within a city or state or region. To a certain extent, the term "loan" is a misnomer, for these depository libraries usually make a "service charge" to film borrowers and in some instances charge their prevailing rental rates. Such variations in charges among depository libraries are due to differences in their own policies and also to differences among Government agencies in the terms of their agreements with depository libraries.

In addition to "depository" film libraries, there are a number of 16mm libraries which have purchased prints of Government films and distribute these prints on a loan or rental basis. And, of course, many of the depository libraries have purchased additional prints in order to meet the demand for particular Government films.

Sale by Government agencies

There is no Government agency, like the Government Printing Office in the field of publications, which has the authority and resources to make and sell prints of all Government films. Certain agencies, such as the Department of Agriculture and the Department of the Army, do have authority to sell, at cost, prints of their films. But generally the sale of films by Government agencies is negligible.

Sale by commercial companies

To a very large extent, the sale of U.S. Government films is now handled by United World Films, Inc. under a competitive bid contract GS-00S-30700, awarded by the General Services Administration. Some agencies have placed their films on sale through the film laboratories in which the film negatives are stored, e.g., the Fish and Wildlife Service and the Office of Civil Defense Mobilization. Other agencies, notably the Department of Agriculture in the sale of its filmstrips, have contracts with other film distributors. With these few exceptions, United World Films handles the sale of U.S. Government films.

Primary and auxiliary distribution methods

It is helpful, sometimes, to classify the distribution methods used by particular agencies as "primary" and "auxiliary." The terms are almost self-explanatory. The Department of Agriculture, for example, distributes its films primarily through its field offices and depository libraries, but it also uses an auxiliary method--that of the sale of prints--in order to make available to interested individuals and groups additional prints for which the Department itself has insufficient funds. The Office of Education, on the other hand, uses sale as its primary means of distribution since in appropriating funds for the production of USOE training films, Congress did not provide funds for distribution prints (and even specified that the production cost of the films should be amortized from the sale of prints). Then, again, the U.S. Information Agency in its overseas programs uses loan as its primary method of distribution, but in the United States its films are available only through sale--its primary method of distribution in the United States.

Foreign use

Practically all of the films listed in this catalog may be used in other countries. Some of them are being distributed overseas by such agencies as the U.S. Information Agency and the International Cooperation Administration which have operating programs in foreign countries. Prints of many of the films have been purchased by institutions and organizations in other countries, particularly the English-speaking countries of Australia, Canada, and New Zealand. Some of the films have been translated into Danish, Dutch, French, Italian, and other languages and used in the European recovery programs.

With rare exceptions, Government agencies other than those with overseas programs do not lend their films for use outside the United States. Foreign users must purchase prints of the films from the sources indicated in this catalog. As an aid to the importation of films into many countries, the U.S. Information Agency has issued Educational Certificates for many of the films in this catalog. Also as an aid to the foreign use of films, the Office of Education, the Department of Agriculture, and certain other Government agencies now permit, subject to certain conditions, their films to be magnetically striped, foreign-language translations of the commentaries to be recorded thereon, and the resultant foreign-language prints to be used. Information concerning the conditions of such use can be obtained from the U.S. Information Service at the U.S. Embassies in other countries or from the U.S. Office of Education, Washington 25, D.C.

Summary

This is a very brief summary of the film programs and services of the United States Government. They are many and varied, ranging from the photographic recording of scientific test data and the copyrighting of commercial films to the production and use of films in the administration and execution of substantive programs authorized by Congress.

The repair of femoral hernia (Motion picture) U. S. Veterans Administration, 1956.

14 min., sd., color, 16 mm.
